Q: Web App to run on client's server and access EC2 from local machine I have an application written in ASP.NET that I would like to run on the client's local machine. It's more or less a desktop application (is that correct?). The client wants to access it from his phone, so he needs to run it as a web app. My question is: can I setup an EC2 instance with IIS running on it and can the client access the instance from his local machine? The reason I would like to do this is so that he can run it directly from his phone, without having to install a visual studio and build for his phone. I'm just worried that what I'm suggesting is a terrible idea. Thanks in advance!

A: It's not a terrible idea at all. You just need to make sure that the client's phone has internet access to your server that they are trying to access. And if they want to be able to edit the application when it's running they will need something more than just a browser and a regular phone. You might want to look into AirPlay, which allows the client to interact with the application directly using their iPhone, iPod Touch, or iPad. Alternately, if they really want to be able to edit the application, they can install the free Google App Engine SDK for Python and run a web server on their machine that will allow them to edit files. They can just upload a new version of the application whenever they want to update it. You can also get access to this through WebAPI, which I believe is free.

Q: How to show the full path of an object in Java If I have an object, for example:
`public class object { private Object name; public object(String name){ this.name = name; } }` And I use it like this: `object o = new object("Hello");` I can easily retrieve the name by doing:
`System.out.println(o.name);` // prints "Hello" Is there a way I can get the full path of object object instead of just printing Hello? I mean, I'd like to print something like this: `public class object { private Object name; public object`
